The Dynamics of Regulations

by Deanna Miles-Brown

We are in an age where resolving environmental concerns and restoring degraded resources are critical to the survival of our state and nation. Aside from education and voluntary action, one of the most effective ways of controlling and improving our environment is through the use of regulations. The Department of the Environment (MDE) processed approximately 166 environmental regulations in 1997. Responsible for regulating air, water, sewerage, solid waste, water, oil and lead pollution, hazardous waste, mining, non-tidal waters and wetlands, and new challenges and issues as they appear, the volume of regulations needing approval will continue to increase.

Regulations become official when they are published in the Maryland Register, a twice monthly publication. Final regulations are reprinted in The Code of Maryland Regulations (COMAR), which is the official compilation of regulations for all state agencies and is issued by the Division of State Documents. Environmental regulations are listed under Title 26.

The regulation process can be dynamic. Each agency's regulations are evaluated to determine its effectiveness as based on current everyday needs. A work plan and evaluation report are submitted to The Joint Committee on Administrative, Executive, and Legislative Review (AELR) and the Governor's Office in an 8 year cycle.

Many MDE regulations cross administrations and even other agencies. For example, both MDE's Waste and Water Administrations take turns amending the same discharge permit regulations; and the burning of hazardous waste would require cooperation between the Air and Waste Administrations. Secretaries from both MDE and the Department of Transportation sign off on regulations concerning the transportation of hazardous materials. Cost sharing of water pollution for animal waste also would need input from both MDE and the Department of Agriculture.

Also, state regulations must be reviewed and compared to federal regulations. If they are comparable or more stringent than federal regulations, further review must occur. These regulations are reviewed by an Environmental Coordinator at the Department of Business and Economic Development. If the state regulation is more stringent, further review is required by the Governor's Office of Legal Counsel and Regulatory Affairs and the Governor's Legislative Office.
